However, it failed to detect the two women who had clinical symptoms and signs of VZV infection. All three women with proven zoster were older than 40 years of age, and two of them presented with a unilateral rash involving the scalp. The test did not detect viremia in women with an acute primary varicella infection or in children younger than 3 years of age with chickenpox. The SHT was the first commercial ELISA test that was approved by the China Food and Drug Administration. The test is performed on a lateral flow device using a polyclonal rabbit anti-VZV antibody. The SHT is believed to be specific for VZV, not cross-reacting with other types of herpesviruses such as herpes simplex virus (HSV) and varicella-zoster virus (VZV). The test uses a mixture of anti-VZV antibodies that cross-react with multiple viral epitopes of VZV. This mixture is formulated so that it reacts positively with VZV-specific antigens, but does not recognize proteins from other herpesviruses \[@B23\].
